when the mail arrived. today's mail was an official DKult industrial complex Easter card for Christmas, courtesy of the Barfa Spewart Tacky Gift Exchange. the word "tacky" made me think of tacky little pamphlets, which made me think of The Blaster, specifically The Blaster's hacks of Bennett poems and their accompanying "explanations" (this train of thought was assisted by a note on the front of the envelope -- Leftwich, Bennett, Keys "We get the job done"). i started replacing the words down the left side of "time pumps a battery into the sewer" with words on the envelope and in the Easter Christmas card. when i got to the bottom i started back up, replacing the second word with words from The Barfa Spewart Tacky Gift Exchange. but i didn't like the results of that, so i stopped a few lines up and re-started at the top (in this gmail text box, starting at the top changes the line-lengths before i get to them, so sometimes the second word is no longer the second word, so i change the new second word). when i got to the line i stopped at on my way up, i moved to the last word of each line, and started over (i didn't mark the line i stopped on on my way up, so where i stopped was "an educated guess"), replacing the last word of each line with words from the envelope and card. as it says in the Easter card: Mary Christmas! What the hell is this?
